The bad news is that the pigs are controlling the narrative here. They've convinced a lot of people that they were justified in their actions, so it's going to make future events more difficult.

At the most powerful level of war, the moral level, the key to victory is to convince the local people to identify with the state, or at least to acquiesce to it, rather than identifying with non-state entities. Meeting this challenge will depend to a significant degree not on what state forces do, but on what they do not do.

A final vulnerability, and probably the most dangerous one for Fourth Generation warriors is that they find it hard to handle success. Unlike traditional insurgents, who are simply vying for control of the government, organizations like Al Qaeda want to destroy the governmental systems they oppose completely. However, other than a vague notion of a caliphate that equates religious leadership with governance and a desire to keep western "Crusaders" out of traditionally Muslim lands, they do not have a clear blueprint for governing. The Al Shabaab militias in Somalia found this out the hard way, and their excesses after they won virtual control of Somalia made it relatively easy for an African Union intervention to oust them in 2011.

Another of the most critical weaknesses of armed non-state actors against the security forces of nation-states is the lack of quality control. Unlike Mac Donalds or Wendy's, the communications problem prevents most armed non-state actors from effectively controlling both the quality and the barbaric excesses of their franchise organizations. Rogue actors like Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq made so many enemies for Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, that they were the prime catalyst for the Sunni Awakening in Anbar province and other Sunni populated areas. Al Qaeda Central probably breathed a secret sigh of relief when the Americans solved their problem for them with two five hundred pound bombs. Likewise in Afghanistan, many Taliban flagrantly exercise much of the corruption and excesses that they accuse the Afghan government of. This alienates the population, and makes the Taliban war effort that much harder.

This lack of strategic communications also means that the Fourth Generational Warriors lack an operational level of war. They cannot put their considerable tactical successes together into a coherent campaign to achieve strategic objectives. Even if they had the desire to do so, they do not have the communications capability to quickly coordinate the actions of widely separated units.

"Whoever is first to recognize, understand, and implement a generational change [in warfare] can gain a decisive advantage. Conversely, a nation that is slow to adapt to generational change opens itself to catastrophic defeat."⁶⁷ Fourth generation warfare is the only type of war that has defeated superpowers. The United States' adversaries in Afghanistan are studying fourth generation warfare, evident by the copies of William Lind and his co-authors' article on fourth generation warfare found by United States' troops in the caves of Tora Bora.⁶⁸

Netwar, also known as fourth generation warfare, applies to societal struggles most often associated with low intensity conflict by non-state actors.³⁶ It attempts to disrupt, damage, or modify what a target population knows or thinks it knows about itself and the world around it.³⁷ Netwar targets elite and/or public opinion through propaganda and psychological campaigns, political and cultural subversion, deception of or interference with local media, and efforts to promote dissident or opposition movements across computer networks.³⁸

It should be noted that fourth generation warfare is not terrorism, though terrorism may use some elements of this approach. Fourth generation wars can result from conflicts such as competition over scarce resources, ethnic cleansing, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and international crime.

Show this threadSomebody Cozy

@CozySomebody · Nov 1

Finally, the authors identify three constructs of fourth generation warfare. First, the state no longer has a monopoly on war.²⁹ Throughout the world, many states already find themselves at war with non-state actors. Second, fourth generation war is marked by a return to a world of cultures and states in conflict.³⁰ No longer is war just between two states with conventional armies. Third, internal division along ethnic, religious, and special interest within one's own society can be the cause of a fourth generation war.³¹

In many ways, the 21st century will offer a war between the forces of Fourth Generation war and those of the Brave New World (BNW). Fourth Generation forces understand this, while the international elites that seek BNW do not. The minutes read, "Osama bin-Laden, though reportedly very wealthy, lives in a cave. Yes, it is for security, but it is also leadership by example. It may make it harder to separate (physically or psychologically) Fourth Generation war leaders from their troops. It also makes it harder to discredit those leaders with their followers. This contrasts dramatically with the BNW elites who are physically and psychologically separated (by a huge gap) from their followers. (Even the gener-

GRAND STRATEGY AND MORAL CONFLICT

To a large degree, "victory" against a 4GW opponent means denying them their goals until the tides of history change and they disperse or dissolve to such a low level that their actions return to incidents impossible to distinguish from ordinary street crime.²³ The key to doing this is what defense analysts and military historians call "grand strategy." It is an extremely old idea. When Sun Tzu talked about attacking alliances as superior to battle or insisted that harmony between the general and his men was the key to military power, he was talking grand strategy.²⁴

At its core, grand strategy encompasses those actions that a side in a conflict takes to pump up its own morale – and so stay in the fight; degrade that of the opposition – and hopefully cause them to quit; and attract the uncommitted to its cause.²⁵ Enormous failures at the tactical and strategic levels of war can be offset by victory at the grand strategic, if the "winner" of the battles finally quits and goes home. This is the terrible attraction of protracted war.²⁶ As many have noted, if the United States eventually loses in Iraq, that is, withdraws before achieving its objectives of establishing a stable democracy, it will largely be because of failure of, or, which is the same thing, lack of grand strategy.²⁷ We will have failed to keep our population on board, to keep our alliance together, and to attract uncommitted peoples to our cause, while our opponents will have succeeded in their efforts to do likewise.

There are other advantages to the non-state player from operating in a loose social network. Obviously a social network is harder to find than an organization that requires a fixed infrastructure and wears uniforms. But perhaps most significant in wars of the weak against the strong, networks are highly resilient, so killing their leaders and destroying portions of the network can leave the rest to regenerate under new leadership in different locations. So long as enough of the network survives to pass along the ideology and culture, along with lessons learned, the new network will likely be more dangerous and more resilient than its predecessor, much like the more resistant forms of bacteria that can emerge as a result of misuse of antibiotics. In fact, the European resistance movements during World War II exhibited just this kind of toughness and survivability.

Information age techniques are ideal for loose networks of highly motivated individuals, which is a typical form of organization for 4GW groups. Modern information warfare places a higher premium on creativity and innovation than it does on things 4GW organizations typically don't have, like massive forces, volumes of regulations, and expensive hardware.⁸ By emphasizing speed and innovation, 4GW groups can often invent new techniques faster than more structured and bureaucratic organizations such as the Pentagon.⁹

Four Generations of Warfare

1 – Line and column: an orderly military for an orderly battlefield; the State monopolizes warfare. (~1648 – ~1860)

2 – Massed firepower: “The artillery conquers, the infantry occupies.” (France, WWI) Attrition is the basic strategy.

3 – Maneuver: “Instead of close with and destroy, bypass and collapse.” (Germany, WWI)

4 – Asymmetric warfare: The monopoly ends. “State militaries are fighting non-state entities worldwide—and almost everywhere, the state is losing.”

The physical level, killing people and breaking things, should be regarded as the least powerful, the moral level is the most powerful, with the mental level being somewhere between the two.

ORIENT

Moral, Mental, and Physical

While important, there is frequently fixation with the physical or kinetic level of war—to the virtual exclusion of the more powerful mental & moral levels.

What we do at the physical or kinetic level can work against us at the mental & moral levels.

At the mental level, there needs to be a more effective use of IO. Of the moral level of war, which John Boyd argued is the most powerful level, there remains little appreciation of its power. In fourth generation war what wins at the physical level tends to lead to defeat at the moral level.
